Full Text: New research shows that the South Bay is doing pretty well economically since the recession. According to the National University System Institute for Policy Research, the pace of the South Bay's economic recovery has tripled that of San Diego County as a whole. Officials say the expansion is from a growing number of high- tech and service companies moving to the area. The information was released at today's 25th Annual Economic Summit, bringing together business leaders from across the region.
